The change of original ð into d (contrary to the general tendency to change d into ð before syllabic r) was prob due to the influence of the AF murdre, moerdre and the Law Latin murdrum.]

1. The most heinous kind of criminal homicide; also, an instance of this. In English (also Sc and U. S.) Law, defined as the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought; often more explicitly wilful murder

In OE. the word could be applied to any homicide that was strongly reprobated (it had also the senses 'great wickedness', 'deadly injury', 'torment') More strictly, however, it denoted secret murder, which in Germanic antiquity was alone regarded as (in the modern sense) a crime, open homicide being considered a private wrong calling for blood-revenge or compensation. Even under Edward I, Britton explains the AF. murdre only as felonious homicide of which both the perpetrator and the victim are unidentified. The 'malice aforethought' which enters into the legal definition of murder, does not (as now interpreted) admit of any summary definition. A person may even be guilty of 'wilful murder' without intending the death of the victim, as when death results from an unlawful act which the doer knew to be likely to cause the death of some one, or from injuries inflicted to facilitate the commission of certain offences It is essential to 'murder' that the perpetrator be of sound mind, and (in England, though not in Scotland) that death should ensue within a year and a day after the act presumed to have caused it. In British law no degrees of guilt are recognized in murder, in the U S the law distinguishes 'murder in the first degree' (where there are no mitigating circumstances) and 'murder in the second degree'.

1858 Edin. Rev Jan. CVII. 190 It is a school of which Mr Kingsley is the ablest doctor, and its doctrine has been described fairly and cleverly as 'muscular Christianity'. The principal characteristics of the writer whose works earned this burlesque though expressive description, are his deep sense of the sacredness of all the ordinary relations and the common duties of life, and the vigour with which he contends for the great importance and value of animal spirits, physical strength, and a hearty enjoyment of all the pursuits and accomplishments which are connected with them. 1858 Tait's Edin Mag. XXV. 101/1 Here our muscular Christian insinuates that [etc] 1858 KINGSLEY Let. 19 Oct. in Lett. & Mem Life (1883) 213 [To a clergyman who, in a review, had called him 'a muscular Christian'] You have used that, to me, painful, if not offensive, term, 'Muscular Christianity'. 1865—David. 5. 1880 DISRAELI Endymion XIV, Nigel was also a sportsman. 1. Mythology. (Now usually with capital.) One of nine sister-goddesses, the offspring of Zeus and Mnemosyne (Memory), regarded as the inspirers of learning and the arts, esp. of poetry and music.

In Greek antiquity there were other accounts as to the number of the Muses and of their parentage. The names of the nine Muses appear first in Hesiod, who says that Calliope is the chief of them Later mythologists assigned to each of the Muses a particular class of functions, which, however, are less definitely limited than they appear in modern allusive use, where Clio is the Muse of history, Thalia of comedy, Melpomene of tragedy, Euterpe of music, and Terpsichore of dancing. The other names, Erato, Polyhymnia, Urania, and Calliope, are rarely mentioned in modern literature, as they have no well-known association with any particular branch of art or knowledge Urania (lit. 'the heavenly'; in formal lists the Muse of astronomy) is invoked by Milton (P. L VII.), who explains that he means not the fabled goddess of mythology, but the true celestial source of inspiration

1. In early use, a fungus of any of the larger 'umbrella-shaped' species, to which the names toad's hat and toadstool were also applied indiscriminately. Now commonly restricted to the common edible mushroom, Agaricus campestris, or to this and species that closely resemble it in general appearance. Some apply mushroom to any fungus supposed to be edible, and toadstool to any that is believed to be deleterious. Certain botanical writers have used the word as equivalent to FUNGUS. The mushroom is a proverbial type of rapid growth

1. That one of the fine arts which is concerned with the combination of sounds with a view to beauty of form and the expression of emotion; also, the science of the laws or principles (of melody, harmony, rhythm, etc.) by which this art is regulated.

Considered as an art, music has two distinct branches, the art of the composer and that of the executant. The word is often used with special reference to the executive branch, and to instrumental execution rather than vocal; thus, the designation of 'a teacher of music' is usually apprehended to mean one who teaches the art of playing on some instrument.

1 A hand-gun of the kind with which infantry soldiers are armed.

Originally applied to the matchlock, and in the 18th c still sometimes distinguished from the 'firelock' or 'fusee'. (From early examples it appears that arrows as well as bullets were discharged from muskets) Subsequently it became the general name for the infantry gun, whatever its construction This use still survives, but as the modern gun is commonly (and in the Army Regulations) called by the specific term rifle, there is a tendency to restrict musket to the obsolete forms of the weapon

II. Used as a pres tense, and hence (under certain conditions) as a past tense corresponding to this

The use as a present arose from the practice of employing the past subj as a moderate, cautious, or polite substitute for the present indicative. The modern use as a past tense coincides with sense 2, but app does not historically descend from it, exc that the preterital use in must needs (see NEED, NEEDS adv.) may perhaps represent a continuous survival.

3 Equivalent to the older MOTE v. 2, expressing necessity Am (is, are) obliged or required to , have (has) to , it is necessary that (I, you, he, it, etc) should In the second person, must now chiefly expresses a command or an insistent request or counsel; in the third person it tends to be restricted to the expression of a necessity which is either imposed by the will of the speaker, or relative to some specified end, or enunciated as a general proposition

d. As a past tense Was obliged, had to , it was necessary that (I, he, it, etc.) should.

In modern use confined to instances of oblique narration, and of the virtual oblique narration in which the speaker has in his mind what might have been said or thought at the time. To say 'I must go to London yesterday' would now be a ludicrous blunder

1691 SHADWELL Scowrers I i 3 In those days a man could not go from the Rose Tavern to the Piazza once, but he must venture his life twice. 1720 WELTON Suffer Son of God I viii 204 Thou wast but just come into the World, when, presently, Thou must Away, and take thy Flight into Egypt. 1781 C JOHNSTON *Hist. 4. In the first person, must often expresses an insistent demand or a firm resolve on the part of the speaker. Hence also in the second and third persons, rendering sentiments imputed to others

a 1425 Cursor M 6569 (Trin.) Who made þis calf I most [other texts I wald] him ken 1509 BARCLAY Ship of Folys (1874) II. 98 Nowe Carles are nat content with one grange Nore one ferme place, such is their insolence They must haue many 1530 PALSGR 642/2, I muste be prayed to do a thynge, je me veulx prier. 1673 DRYDEN Mar. à-la Mode IV iii 60, I must, and will go 1798 JOANNA BAILLIE Tryal V 1, Softly, Mariane, let us leave this room, if you must laugh, for he will overhear you 1827 WORDSW Lit Cist (1905) 258 He is not content with a ring and a bracelet, but he must have rings in the ears, rings on the nose—rings everywhere

5 As must has no participle, the need of a past conditional has been supplied by placing the principal verb in the perfect infinitive. Thus I must have seen it = I should (in the case supposed) necessarily have seen it, I must have done it = I should have had to do it, or have been obliged to do it.

[Adopted in 16th c., partly from Sp. mostacho, and partly from its source, It mostaccio moustache, also face, snout, mostacchio moustache (cf. Albanian mustakes, Rumanian mustate moustache), a derivative of Gr. μυστακ-, μύσταξ masc (also βύσταξ) moustache, a Doric word, commonly believed (notwithstanding the difference both in meaning and in gender) to be a dialectal variant of μάσταξ fem., mouth, jaws

In the 16–17th c. the word appears in a multitude of corrupt forms due to imperfect apprehension or recollection of the sound. Some of them suggest a pseudo-etymological association with Sp muchacho boy

In the sing the word is almost or entirely obsolete, being superseded by MOUSTACHE, but the plural mustachios has considerable currency, sometimes occurring in books that have moustache in the singular With regard to the pronunciation of the first syllable cf MOUSTACHE]

¶ d. quasi-elliptical Pertaining to or characterized by some (implied) mutual action or relation.

Mutual terms, principles used to describe a business arrangement between two parties, in which exchange of services takes the place of money payments

1848 Thackeray Van Jaar v, He was admitted into Dr Swishtail's academy upon what are called 'mutual-principles'—that is to say, the expenses of his board and schooling were defrayed by his father in goods, not money. 1880 Encycl Brit XIII 173/2 These bodies [life assurance companies] have been of three kinds—(1) the purely mutual offices, in which the assured themselves constitute the society, (2) proprietary offices ., and (3) the mixed offices.

2 Respective, belonging to each respectively

In some of the examples there is a mixture of sense 1, the notion being that of a reciprocal relation between each of the persons and what belongs to the other

1548 Udall, etc Erasm, Par Acts 37 b, Euen so the lorde prepared, in theyr mutuall vision, eache one for other [Saul & Ananias] 1652 Loveday tr Calprenede's Cassandra III 207 The tears that were shed on both sides in the remembrance of their mutuall losses 1755 J. 2 Used vocatively. a. Prefixed affectionately to terms of relationship or endearment; also, affectionately or compassionately, or in a jocular or merely familiar tone, to certain designations which are otherwise rarely used vocatively, as in my man, my boy, my good fellow, my poor man (See also Dear a.[1] 2 b, c, for the use as prefixed to that adj)

In modern English it is not (as in some languages) the rule of ordinary speech to prefix my to terms of relationship (father, mother, brother, etc) used vocatively, the use belongs to impassioned literary language Son and daughter, however, are exceptions, and the omission of my before the vocative friend is somewhat arch or rhetorical

L mystērium, a Gr μυστήριον, f. μῦς-*, root of μύειν to close (the lips or eyes): cf μύστης MYSTES.

In classical Greek μυστηριον occurs chiefly in plural, denoting certain secret religious ceremonies (the most famous being those of Demeter at Eleusis) which were allowed to be witnessed only by the initiated, who were sworn never to disclose their nature (See sense 9 below) In the LXX the word occurs only in Daniel and the Apocrypha, where it has the sense of 'secret purpose or counsel' (esp of a king or of God) This sense is found in the N T, where the word also means sometimes a religious truth long kept secret, but now revealed through Christ to his Church, and sometimes anything that has a symbolic significance In later Christian Greek μυστηριον became equivalent to SACRAMENT (in several passages the Vulgate renders it by sacramentum, even when it means only 'secret', in other passages mysterium is retained) In OF and English the Christian senses of the word naturally appear earliest.]

PREFACE TO THE LETTER N.

THIS concluding portion of Volume VI, containing the words which begin with N, includes 3484 Main words, 440 Special Combinations explained under these, 2298 Subordinate entries, and 1570 Obvious Combinations, in all 7792 words. Of the Main words, 1079 are marked † as obsolete. and 147 are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized *

N is one of the smaller letters in respect of the number of words beginning with it, and occupies only about half the space of L, and one-third that of M. Although including a considerable number of words in very common use, it does not comprise any which require very extensive treatment; the longer articles rarely exceed four or five columns, and a large number are comparatively short. In most cases the words have a very definite sense or senses, so that difficulties of arrangement or definition are few. On the etymological side, also, N is not a difficult letter; the great majority of the words being either native English, with clear cognates in the other Teutonic tongues, or Latin, adopted directly or through French. Those to which more or less obscurity attaches are chiefly short words of a colloquial type, as nag (horse), nap (to seize), nape, nasty, natty, nib, nibble, nick, nip, nipple, nob, nobble, nod, noddle, noddy, nog, noggin, noodle, nugget, etc. The origin of words of this class is very often obscure, and the absence of similar forms in the cognate languages makes it probable that they are mainly of native origin, though their history cannot be clearly traced.

The number of native words in N is considerably increased by the coalescence of the OE. negative ne with the following word. Hence the forms naught, neither, never (ne'er), no, none, nor, not, nothing, nought, and the dialect or obsolete na, nat, nather, nauther, nother, nouther. (The distinction in form between naught and nought goes back to OE, and has not hitherto been clearly exhibited.) Formerly also this ne was prefixed to certain verbs, of which the only surviving representative is nill; illustrations of the others are given under nabbe, nad, nave, nam, nas, nis, nys; nist, not(e, etc.

Another addition to the words beginning with N is made by the cases in which the final letter of an or more rarely then (dative) has been transferred to the following word. In ME. this might occur with any word beginning with a vowel (see N 3), but the tendency towards the transference was more persistent in some cases than in others, as exemplified by nall, naul (awl), nain, nown (own), naunt and nuncle; in nickname and nonce the wrong division has become permanent.

Although no original prefix, either English or Latin, begins with N, the place of one has been taken by the Latin non, first introduced in a few Anglo-French words, and gradually extended in use until its application is practically unlimited. In this respect it resembles the real prefixes re- and un-, the full illustration of which in any dictionary is impossible.

The material originally collected for the letter N was subedited by various hands, viz. Na- and Nicher—Niggot by the Rev. A. P. Fayers, Yeadon, Leeds; Ne- by Mr. A. Hailstone, Manchester; Ni- to Niched by Prof F. E. Bumby, Nottingham; Nigh—Nizy by Mr. H. A. Nesbit, Hampstead; No—Nonyl by Mrs. G. H. Pope, Clifton (now Oxford); Noodle—Nozzle by Mr. E. L. Brandreth, London, and Nu- to the end of the letter by Mr. R. F. Green, Liverpool. Since this work was done, much fresh material had accumulated, often of great value in helping toward the real history of the various words.

Among those to whom acknowledgements are due for assistance in dealing with special words are Prof. I. Bywater of Oxford; Prof. W. W. Skeat of Cambridge; Mr. James Platt, Jr., who has supplied definite information regarding words from various American, African, and Asiatic languages; Dr. Alex. M'Kenzie, who specially revised the chemical terms connected with nitre; Dr. D. Hay Fleming, Edinburgh; and Mr. J. Maitland Anderson of the University Library, St. Andrews. Mr. E. L. Brandreth has helped by verification, in the British Museum Library, of references to books not accessible in Oxford.

PREFACE TO THE LETTER N.

The proofs have been regularly read by Lord Aldenham, Mr. A. Caland, of Wageningen, Holland (who has done great service in verifying references and in other respects), Mr. H. Chichester Hart (who has supplied many quotations from Elizabethan literature), the Rev. J. A. Milne of Lync, Peeblesshire, and latterly by the Rev Canon Fowler, of Durham.

Those who have more immediately assisted in the preparation of N have been Mr. J. M. Ramsay, M.A. (in the earlier part), Mr. L. F. Powell, Miss E. R. Steane, Mr. F. R. Ray, Mr. J. H. Smithwhite, B A., and (since the beginning of the present year) Mr G. Watson. The article on NON-, and all the words beginning with this prefix, together with NONCE, were independently prepared by Mr. C. T. Onions, M A

W. A. CRAIGIE.

N

N (en), the fourteenth letter of the modern, and thirteenth of the ancient Roman alphabet, represents historically the Greek nū and the Semitic nun. The earlier Greek forms were Ν and Ν, corresponding to the Phœnician 𐤍 The sound usually denoted by the letter is a voiced nasal consonant with front closure (the point of the tongue touching the teeth or the fore part of the palate). It is, however, also capable of being used as a sonant or vowel, here denoted by ('n), as in bidden (bi d'n), bitten (bɪt'n), slacken (slæk'n). With one or other of these values the letter is very frequent in English, and is silent only in a few cases at the end of syllables after l and m, as kiln, damn, condemn, contemn, limn, hymn, solemn, column.

Before the sounds (g) and (k) the letter n is also employed in English to denote a nasal with back tongue-closure, in this dictionary distinguished as (ŋ), as in finger (fɪ·ŋgəɹ), think (θɪŋk) When not followed by these sounds, this back-nasal is expressed by the digraph ng, as in hang (hæŋ), sing, song. (On the difference in pronunciation between finger and singer, etc., see the note to the letter G.)

In Scottish texts of the 15–16th centuries the change of Latin and French gn to ng is frequently represented in the spelling of such words as sing sign, ring, reng reign, and ngn is common between vowels, as resingnit resigned, maugnitude, etc.

2 In OE. n is very frequent as the terminal letter of inflectional syllables, as in the -an of the infinitive and the oblique cases of weak nouns. In southern texts this n is always retained, but in the north it appears to have been generally dropped by the middle of the 10th century In ME. the retention or dropping of the letter varied in the different midland and southern dialects. On the other hand, the -en of strong past pples., which became -e in southern dialects, was retained in the north as in modern English.

In inflectional syllables (as in reading, writing, etc.) -ng has in many dialects been reduced to n, and this pronunciation (usually called 'dropping one's g's') may sometimes be heard even from educated speakers.

3. In ME. the n of the indefinite article an is frequently transferred to a following word beginning with a vowel (while a converse process has given such forms as adder, apron, and auger) The forms thus produced occasionally alliterate with words properly beginning with n, and in one or two cases (as newt and nickname) have finally established themselves in the language. The following are examples of the practice from ME. and early modern texts.
